

Students of Mr. Kundert's class here review a lesson in geography.

Discussing ideals of citizenship are Samuel Burson and Harry Phillips.

Special Education Courses Help Students at Hughes

Special Education is a relatively new field of education. It covers areas of education in which students benefit from the work and guidance of specially trained teachers. These teachers must have a great deal of patience and be very dedicated to their jobs. Because of this they probably receive greater satisfaction from their work than do teachers in any other field of education. Special equipment, including special texts and visual aids, is used to supplement the ordinary classroom materials.

Special education at Hughes includes classes for the deaf, for the partially sighted, and for students who wish to avail themselves of special training. The deaf and partially sighted receive extra help from their respective teachers, Mr. Kundert and Miss Ashley. The other special education classes are taught by Mr. Britton and Mr. Ridenour. The courses offer practical training to help the students in later life. Classroom activities and projects encourage the students to work together in a friendly and enthusiastic way.

These students, who receive added guidance and help from special education, also make important contributions to Hughes High School activities.

Members of Mr. Ridenour's class, Judy Dozier, Bonita Weike, and Paul Schoolcraft, are doing a reading exercise under his guidance.

