

Graduating classes of seniors are usually described by a long, tired, list of cliches that all lead to the idea that the future of the world depends upon them.

Before Covington Catholic's one hundred seventy-six graduates become dismayed by such frightful prospect, we would like to remind them that millions of other people are also trying to shape the future and if the seniors can get together with them the job of future shaping will become fairly simple.

Hopefully, four years at Covington Catholic has taught them the importance of unity and the Christian values necessary to attain it. If this lesson has been learned the future will hold no unsolvable problems.
