

Foreword

Time has passed so quickly! Four short years ago we stood, as freshmen, thinking that graduation would bring a termination to all our problems; believing that this step in itself would be our goal, and beyond . . . well, that was but a hazy dream.

We have reached that goal now, only to find that graduation in itself is relatively unimportant; that point for which we strive has been pushed just out of reach. The realization comes that it was not this one step, but all the struggles and problems we overcame to reach it that will prove most important in later life.

Commencement, yes, it is just that! A beginning that we dare to undertake only because of the basic knowledge of right and wrong that was instilled in us through four years of careful guidance. The facts we once learned may fail us; but if we have learned to think, to discern, then we have gained a thousand times more than any book can offer.

We have had the work, the fun, and the friendships; in using these we must keep a sense of proportion that our lives to come may obtain a true significance.

So, Class of '55, we give you this book as a memento of that Senior year of joy and happiness.
