CRUSADER

To achieve creativity in layout and article content, to have comprehensive news coverage, and to produce a paper that had "something to say" were the goals which the 1967-68 edition of the Crusader staff set for themselves. To attain these goals, the staff decided that it had to come out with a newspaper at least once a month, and more if possible. Under the guidance of Brother Joe Rigot, the staff almost made it, failing only in March to produce a new edition.

The majority of the work done on the paper during the year was due largely to the efforts of editor-in-chief, Eric Schlueter, and his assistants. It was their responsibility to assign articles to the writers, submit page layouts, make up headlines, assemble all copy, and arrange it in its final stage for printing.

In all their efforts throughout the year, the staff members tried to give the Crusader a personality and individuality, and make it a paper that students would want to read. They tried to make it the very best paper possible, alive and sensitive to the multitude of personalities which made up Moeller High School in the past year.

"This is 'bad news'."
