

negligent notable ●

● The annual G.A.A. assembly this year has a mystery for its theme. A crime had been committed, a horrible crime for a Withrow girl, and the Negligent Notable was guilty. The trial was held at the assembly with the auditorium filled to capacity. Among those present were others guilty of the same crime. The crime?—the Negligent Notable had forgotten to join the G.A.A. The identity of this notable person was unknown, but throughout the skits presented by the G.A.A. members, clues were found and evidence was established. Although the skits, which depicted the history of girls' sports from the Ancient Grecian period to the French bathing suit time, were delightful and the music and songs of Kay Wildeson were lovely, the fact that the guilty person was still loose hung heavy on the students' minds. Soon the clues were sufficient to convict Jean Wheatley of high treason and sentence her to one happy year in G.A.A. amid gay laughter.
