

"George Washington Slept Here" was one of the cleverest comedies ever produced in Withrow's auditorium. From the opening scene to the hilarious close the audience roared or chuckled through the misfortunes of the Fullers in their efforts to make a beautiful, old, inconvenient house into comfortable living quarters. The scene in which the family viciously wrecks the place after at last succeeding in making it habitable really brought down the house. Every role was capably and cleverly interpreted. Mr. Kimber, with his comical drawl and his phlegmatic manner, drew an enthusiastic response from the audience every time he made an appearance. Mrs. Fuller, too, carried the audience with her through her every mood. The settings were essential to the plot and great care was taken to make the background effective. In fact the careful work done by all those responsible for the scenery and directing of the play was excellent. This comedy was directed by advance students of the Schuster-Martin School of Dramatics.
