

Woodward has never failed its country. For one hundred and twelve years, this grand old institution has squarely faced the challenge of education, of citizenship, of patriotism, and has never been found wanting. The history of its alumni written in the halls of fame bears witness to its glorious achievements.

The Woodward of today carries on. The Seniors of 1943, like their predecessors, bid fair to be no exception. They are intelligent, serious-minded young people, ready and eager to assume their places in life. They have met the demands of changing conditions and have geared their education, not only to the ideals of fine citizenship, but also to the requirements of a world at war.

As they leave these halls of learning and step forward into the service of their country, whether it be on battlefields or production lines, may they go with the knowledge that Woodward is proud of them! May God bless and keep them—everyone!
