

Civilization builds its hope for a better world on youth, on those who will be the citizens of more enlightened, more democratic countries, countries no longer bounded by barriers shutting out other citizens of one world.

No thoughtful person can review the history of the bloodiest and most widespread of all wars without a feeling of pride and gratitude to the youthful men and women who saved our world and salvaged civilization, too often at the cost of all their tomorrows. They had been trained and educated for their part in that titanic conflict and gloriously they bore witness to the rightness of their training.

Education for youth's part in the world of tomorrow must be better than any system offered during past generations. It must be education for their place in a world-state rather than as citizens of any one geographically limited country. Such education is a challenge to educators everywhere. The core of all future education must be training for citizenship in a world-state—for world brotherhood, for a broader, deeper, fuller life, and for a more fruitful harvest through world-wide cooperation in every enterprise that enriches human life and dignifies the individual.

B. F. FULKS.