To the Graduating Class:

You have now reached a stage of maturity and ability that will enable you to meet your problems with a clear mind, a strong body, and a resolute will to succeed. Remember that work intelligently done is an honorable thing; that it is not so much the character of the work you do, but rather the character you put into your tasks that is important. Your ideal should be to love your work, and to see in your work opportunity to serve; to look upon your work as a blessing; to approach your task each day with joy and with the determination to make that day's work one filled with accomplishment and success; to meet each new day as a challenge to develop your skills and understandings and your power to do; to realize that in all your work there is dignity in just the ratio to the pride and effort you put into it. Work leads to success which will give you the rewards in personal satisfaction, recognition, and worldly goods that you deserve.
