COMMENCEMENT stirs many emotions. To some it is a relief, to others a regret, many feel highly confident and hopeful, a few, perhaps, are over-modest as they look upon their futures, and for all there is at least a touch of sadness in leaving friends, associations and material surroundings which through years have provided the experiences of daily life.

The University has done its best to provide the means for moral, mental, and physical development. The results of this training depend on character, industry, and originality, and these traits, no amount or kind of formal teaching can alone create.
