

THE ATHLETE

One of the first requisites of an athlete is good looks and plenty of women. He does not have to know anything about the game if he makes a good appearance on the field or gym floor. If he has at least one easily injured knee and a weak stomach he can easily arouse the sympathy of the fair sex, and, after all—what else counts?

THE POLITICIAN

The first necessity for a politician is a party. Good back-slapping technique helps, but the greatest asset of all is the dogged spirit of do or die persistence. Intelligence is a great handicap. A general knowledge of the fraternity situation at Kenyon, where the boys really do things, is practically indispensable.

THE ACTOR

An actor is a person who never will amount to anything on the stage, but who never opens a door without the gestures of a Barrymore or never says "Good morning" without the most magnificent flourishes. He knows at least two highly romantic and effective declamations for use on any and all occasions.
