Michigan Frosh Serpent-Dance

The third game of the season may safely be summed up in the words, "Defeated, but not disgraced." The Bearcats, confronted by an aggregation which was superior in weight, speed, stamina and experience, made a noble fight, but were beaten by a team which was the better of the two.

Michigan State, with a set of the hardest hitting backs seen in many a year, forced the Red and Black warriors backward time after time, and during the course of the game amassed five touchdowns. The first came soon after the opening kick-off, which the big white team took, to march straight down the field, in spite of several temporary Cincinnati braces. Nothing daunted, the Bearcats came back snarling, and for the rest of the first half outplayed the foe by a noticeable margin, several times threatening, but lacking the punch to score against the heavy Spartan line. They outfought and outgamed their opponents and left the field amidst the cheers of even the Michigan State cohorts.

In the second half, however, the battering which the Varsity line was getting began to tell. Dazed and weary, the Bearcats began to fall prey to Michigan's puzzling plays, several of which were so deceptive as to end in long runs and scores. Bewildered, but always game, the Red and Black fought back as best it could, but the best wasn't sufficient, and the Spartans increased their margin of victory.

For Cincinnati, Goldmeyer's punting and Sipple's sterling defensive play were outstanding. These two were big factors in holding the score down. Metz, although he showed inexperience at several critical points, played a very good game at end, throughout. Cincinnati partisans who saw the game unanimously agreed that an out-classed Bearcat team made a truly magnificent fight against long odds, and was in no wise disgraced by its loss.
