

Trapped

Cincinnati disappointed everyone in the Wittenberg game by showing a general let-down in form, which resulted in the Lutherans' emerging victorious after an interesting combat. The two teams appeared evenly matched in the center of the field, but Wittenberg took full advantage of the only scoring chances afforded them by the Bearcats, and in return checked every Bearcat threat. With one of the strongest forward walls in the state, the Lutherans played havoc with the plunging game of the Bearcats, Cincy's sole offensive consisting of the completion of half of twenty-six forward passes.

Neither team threatened in the first quarter and the ball passed from one to the other, always being in play near the center of the field. In the second quarter, Cincinnati fumbled a Maroon punt, and Wittenberg immediately began a goalward drive, mixing passes with line thrusts. After the ball reached the three yard line, Smith, the heavy Lutheran fullback, escorted it across the dead-line for a score. The rest of the half witnessed the Bearcats passing the way to scoring position and then losing the ball through a woeful lack of punch.

Shortly after the second half started, Wittenberg started the march for its second touchdown when Lanning returned a Cincinnati punt for twenty-five yards to place the ball well inside Cincinnati territory. The up-state eleven then uncorked a series of spinner plays, with the obnoxious Smith again crossing the Red and Black line for the inevitable tally. For the rest of the game Cincinnati proved a constant threat, but always failed in the crucial moments, either through fumbles or intercepted passes. Had the Varsity passes clicked as effectively near the Maroon goal as they did in midfield, the story might have been greatly altered. Such was not the case, however, much to the sorrow of Bearcat partisans.

At times the Red and Black warriors played a brilliant game defensively, and then again the opposite was true. Wittenberg's invariable ability to return Varsity punts for disastrous distances hurt throughout the game.
