

The final Buckeye game, with Miami, was a classic. Kunz and Bass tangled in a slab duel, both showing dazzling form. Cincinnati took a one-run lead in the second inning, but the Big Red diamond artists tied it up in the fourth. Then followed sixteen innings of heart-breaking, record-smashing baseball during which both teams had innumerable opportunities to win, but could not cash in. Circus stops, one handed stabs, double plays, everything possible—except a score—was shoved into those sixteen innings. By the twentieth, no one had any vocal cords left. In the twenty-first frame Fink, who had taken Kunz's place when his ankle gave way, retired the first man, but the next hit. Then came a strike-out. With two out, Wheeler of Miami popped up an easy foul, but Cincy's catcher and third sacker failed to take it. Given this reprieve, Wheeler drove a long single to left center, scored the runner, and broke up the best ball game ever played in the B. I. A. C.
