

CATHERINE BUCKLEY, R.N., B.S.
Director of the School of Nursing and Health

The great central principle of nursing is that of service to one's fellow men, and those who have realized that principle and have acted upon it are the nurses who have made possible the great progress in this ever changing world of health. Along with the ideals of service must go knowledge and skill—a combination that will enable you to find the desirable satisfactions of life within your profession; these may be secured only by courses of study which have been organized on a permanent educational basis.

Catherine Buckley

One of the most gratifying facts established during the present economic turmoil is that the percentage of trained women who have been displaced is much less than that of untrained workers.

The trained woman takes to her work not only knowledge of techniques, but also a deeper sense of responsibility plus a greater sense of confidence and courage. It should be obvious that women who approach the problems of the home with the same sense of worthwhileness that trained women take to a profession will give the home its proper role in society.

Elizabeth Dyer

ELIZABETH DYER, A.B.
Director of the School of Household Administration